Knowing how to check laptop battery health in Windows 11 is a handy trick as it will tell you whether your laptop's flagging battery life is the rest of a hardware or software problem.

The lithium-ion batteries in most of our electronics wear down and become less effective over time, but in order to check just how much of your battery capacity is gone you need to dig a little deeper than the battery menu in the settings, but follow our instructions and you'll have a full battery health checkup complete in less than a minute.

Here you will see a breakdown of the original capacity of your battery listed as "Design Capacity" and then the "Full Charge Capacity" that represents what the battery now tops out at when full. The first entry will be your first usage, scroll down to the end for the current peak, for the nearly two-year-old ThinkPad that I'm using the full charge capacity is now 36,480 mWh down from 44,540 mWh, so my battery has lost about 18% of its total capacity.

The other section of interest is "Battery life estimates." This is laid out similarly to battery capacity history but shows the battery life estimate with the current capacity of your laptop compared to the original capacity of your battery.

Again scroll to the bottom and you'll see an overall estimate of battery life on a single charge based on your usage both with your current battery capacity and the original battery capacity of your laptop.

Hopefully armed with this knowledge you can make an informed decision on whether your battery capacity has dwindled far enough that it's time for a new laptop. If laptop longevity is a primary concern for you then we would recommend taking a look at the laptops with the best battery life, so you are starting with the largest capacity possible.

Fortunately, for most laptops made in the last 5 to 10 years, there are replacement batteries available for $100 or less, and service manuals that explain how to replace the built-in unit on your own. But before you decide to swap out your old battery for a new one, you should get a battery health report to see just how much capacity it has left.
