In sad weather days it could be that your sun panels are not generating enough energy, what to do? Logically you just stop using electricity and wait or go to a camping and pay in between 10 and 20 euros a night. But before you do these options, check around if you have any of the following spots around you, they might have some free to use power sockets;

Football fields are a little bit harder to get power from, because the sockets often are not close to the road. Most of the time they're on the building around them like the dressing room, tribune or the lunchroom. So you won't be able to charge your interior battery with it, but if it's nice weather you can hang around the socket for half a day to charge all your electronics.

Inside shopping centres you can find sitting areas with power sockets and sometimes free wifi. Not a good place to charge your interior battery, but a good spot at cold days to work and charge your electronics!

On the app Park4night you can find camper spots that provide electricity. The electricity is sometimes free in cold seasons. These camper spots have more other handy facilities like watertaps and the possibility to dump your gray water.

Most campers have a relay that charges the interior battery when the car battery is full. Running the engine for one hour will charge the interior battery a bit, but yeah, sitting in a camper with a running engine is not really comfy. This is why we ourselves only do this as a last resort.

Inspired by Ana's 3 years ago I decided to leave my appartement in Amsterdam behind and buy a camper to seek adventures in nature. Instantly at the start I was sure this minimalistic lifestyle was going to be my destiny for a long time! Everyday I find beauty in the travel and the realisation in each destination. I'm sure that anybody could find their own appeal in this if they'd just give it a shot!

I'm surprised actually that these types of maps haven't popped up in society yet especially with everyone owning a mobile phone and needing a place to plug in. I think a map like this for every major city would be worthwhile.
