Handling and shipping labels are an essential component of the logistics and supply chain process as they provide crucial information about the contents of a package and its handling requirements. They include instructions on how to safely handle and transport packages, including warnings about fragile contents, instructions on keeping packages upright, or information about temperature-sensitive items.

Also known as United Nations packaging symbols or UN markings, UN labels are standardized symbols used to identify hazardous materials during transport. They communicate important information about the contents of a package, including the type of hazard posed by the material and any special handling requirements it may have.

UN labels follow a standardised system established by the United Nations Committee of Experts on the Transport of Dangerous Goods. Having such a system ensures consistency in the labelling of hazardous materials worldwide, enabling safe handling and transportation across international borders. Each label features a unique identification code that corresponds to a specific type of hazardous material depending on the risk it poses. This includes flammable liquids, corrosive substances and toxic gases, with labels colour coded in accordance with the primary hazard they present.
